revision of their reports, have succeeded, through studious application and effort, in preparing reports which require little or no revision to make them very creditable to the individual and the organization.

Another feature of report procedure is that, as a precaution against possible error, all figures and references in reports are checked in the office. Occasionally it is found that accountants place too much reliance upon that verification and are not as careful as they might be with respect to the accuracy of reports. It seems hardly necessary to state that full responsibility in such matters rests upon the accountant doing the work.

The attitude of the accountant toward his report should, therefore, in all respects be that of responsibility and pride. He should aspire to such a degree of perfection that he would be glad to have the report known as his work.
